ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Many individuals have helped me develop the ideas presented here and have offered comments on drafts of earlier versions of this book. I would like to thank colleagues and faculty at the University of Sussex where my research for this project started. I am particularly grateful to Alison Stone and Tanja Staehler for their careful reading of my work, their encouragement, and valuable comments. Thank you to the philosophy department at the University of Hertfordshire for offering me the opportunity to lecture on Plato's Republic and Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit, and for engaging with my research, especially Brendan Larvor, John Lippitt, Jane Singleton and Daniel D. Hutto. I am also thankful to the philosophy faculty at the Open University, and especially the Head of Department, Manuel Dries, for extending resources that allowed me to complete my research and writing.

Earlier versions of portions of this book have been presented at various conferences and colloquia. An earlier version of Chap. 2 was delivered at the 2015 'Thinking in the Open' Open University philosophy conference. Chapter 4 was presented at the 2005 Hegel Society of Great Britain annual conference on 'Hegel and the Greeks'. Chapter 5 has been presented at the Social and Political Thought graduate/faculty seminar at the University of Sussex, and Chap. 6 has been presented at the conference 'Hegelian Philosophy: A Renaissance?' at the University of Sheffield. I would like to thank the organisers and participants of these conferences for their helpful comments, especially Thom Brooks, Fabian Freyenhagen, Allegra de Laurentiis, Stephen Houlgate, Alfredo Ferrarin, Kimberly Hutchings and Maureen Eckert.

A big thank you to my editor, Brendan George, for his support of this project, and to the publishing team of Palgrave Macmillan for their efficiency and hard work. Finally, my gratitude goes to Persephone for challenging me and for many discussions on this book, on life, on everything.
